

Janan Wyatt, Ph.D.

I earned my PhD in Clinical Psychology from the University of Rhode Island, with a specialty concentration in multicultural psychology. I completed my undergraduate studies at Syracuse University where I majored in Psychology and double-minored in Education and African American Studies. My program of research focuses on providing efficacious treatment for traditionally underserved and minoritized groups, which is reflected in my clinical practice. As a clinician I have worked with individuals confronting issues such as substance use, mood disorders, interpersonal trauma, pervasive community violence, chronic homelessness, and serious mental illness. I have a specialty interest working with individuals involved in the legal system or who have been most recently released from incarceration. My program of research has focused on substance use in African American communities, and specifically targets increasing treatment utilization, improving outcomes, and expanding access to equitable health services and culturally congruent care.
